He said: You can't have five bucks. She said, OK, then you can't follow me! Teri M. Nelson, a divorce lawyer in Milwaukee, told us about a couple who had a lot of money. The guy put his wife on a strict budget. She stuck until he told her she couldn't go out for ice cream since they already had boxes in the freezer. I see it all the time. Instead of hashing out a broader issue - finance! one side is held back until something seemingly insignificant pushes it over the edge, Nelson says. Message: If you're not happy, so to speak, the moment before your pent-up anger escalates and some stupid little thing sets you up. She told her friends about his erectile dysfunction. When one husband realized that his now ex-wife had dished to his girls about his sexual problems, it was clear that he felt humiliated, said Eric Newton, a San Francisco lawyer who represented his wife. Emasculating topics such as bedroom flaws or even poor review work should be closed. They make him feel inadequate, and that he can't trust you, which is hard to recover from, says Jane Greer, Ph.D., marriage and family therapist and author of What About Me? Stop selfishness from ruining your relationship. Sure, we all love a good bitchfest, but let's remind you of a little game called Phone. You say to your friends: We have a problem in bed. They hear: He can't get it. They pass together: He's probably on 2016! It's not cool. She raved about her male colleague. A client of Los Angeles divorce lawyer Kelly Chang Rickert said his wife constantly compared him to the wonderful guy she worked with. It turned out that he had reasons to be angry (she cheated), but the bigger picture, comparing purchases can destroy even the right relationship. Couples essentially agree to be each other's number one fan, so over-praising someone else can make your partner feel diminished, says Greer. She refused his mother's gift. Chang Rickert worked with a guy whose wife hated her own laws so much that she turned them down for Tiffany's necklace. This made her husband realize that no matter how well his parents tried to be, there would be no getting along. If your boyfriend cares about his family and you reject them, it can drive a wedge between you, Greer says. Try to compromise and if it fails, smile and nod. She punished him in the bedroom -- not in a good way. Newton says couples often come to him during a sex drought. They have tensions as a result of other problems, and one side begins to hold sex as a fighting tactic, he says. It's basically the sexual equivalent of silent treatment. And how to stay dumb, viciously crossing your feet doesn't solve anything. In addition, you a healthy way to feel close. We're not telling you to do it if you don't feel like it, but repeat after us: Sex is not a weapon. Photograph: Peter Dazeley/Getty Images As we discussed on the previous page, there are several ways to get a divorce, and how much it is varies greatly. According to Divorce Masters, a contested divorce usually costs more than $30,000, while an indirect divorce can cost less than $5,000. People can save significant money (and suffering) by agreeing to a settlement and not going to court. Mediation, with or without the help of a lawyer, is almost always the least expensive way to go if you need outside guidance. You can also do it all yourself, known as Pro Se. According to Daniel Sitarza, a lawyer who wrote Divorce himself: National No Guilt Divorce Kit, people can develop their own settlement agreements, fill out forms and file for divorce without the help of a lawyer. That is, if they can agree on a settlement. Advertising however, not all cases can be resolved without the help and advice of a divorce lawyer. Disagreements over property, spousal support and child custody must be resolved, and if an intermediary or joint lawyer cannot help resolve the matter, the only thing left is to take it before a judge. You can represent yourself in this case, but it's a bad idea if your spouse has hired a lawyer because you'll start at a disadvantage. According to most experts, both spouses using the same lawyer is also a bad idea. This creates a conflict of interest for the lawyer, and both parties cannot be represented fairly. The review of the divorce process varies depending on several factors. First of all, location determines a lot of what is required. The type of divorce and participation in divorce and whether there are children also changes this process. If there are no children under the age of 18 and there is no disagreement over the distribution of property, a simplified divorce is often possible. When there are children involved and when there is disagreement about the settlement, it becomes more sticky. Many courts require childcare to work with children after a divorce, and some also require couples to go through mediation to work through disputes. The main steps are this: In the following sections, we will walk through each of these steps and explore the different options available at every stage of the divorce process, starting with separation. Because while the law plays a role, I think, in divorce, it plays a much smaller role. I think it's really more psychological chess. And, you know, the goal is that you can get out of marriage in a way that is as healthy and respectful as possible, and hopefully maintain some relationship with your spouse, because if there are children involved, you will be sharing an upbringing with that person for the rest of your life. On the importance of marriage agreements: I think most people don't like prenuptial contracts because they say they're unromantic and you're planning a divorce and that's it. And I understand that very well. You know, one of the things that I think can be very positive about a prenuptial contract is that, first of all, it gets rid of as much as possible, some elements of uncertainty when people go into marriage. I think it can also really help people in marriage, if done right, for different reasons. One specific is that it can dictate what will happen, you know, so that everyone has a good feeling of going into marriage to what can happen after a divorce. I think it can be very comforting for people, especially when you have such a discrepancy in income. James J. Sexton's interview also included an excerpt from our 2018 interview with divorce lawyer James Sexton on how to keep your marriage from breaking up. Here's James on the questions that people should ask before deciding to get married: I think one of the first things that people should talk about is in a very frank way, how they'll have conversations in marriage. It's like talking about talking. I think it's incredibly important. I think you should talk about what we're going to do when one of us feels something? If one of us feels bored, if one of us feels frustrated, if one of us feels sex is not where it should be. If any of us feel like we're not spending enough time together. If one of us has some strange grudge we're harboring. How long are we going to let this sit before we talk about it? Are there any reviews or ideas for us? Want to be featured on the show?
